Hey Mommy ...Look at Me!!

DayCare Providers

Sometimes video services have nothing to do with security. A daycare center in the Midwest was already set up with a CCTV system, which allowed parents to log in through the Internet and watch their children in their classrooms. While most parents were overjoyed to be able to see their kids during the day, some privacy issues had been raised about the lack of security on the Internet. Who else might be watching these children?

Since a CCTV system was already in place, the security dealer proposed attaching the cameras to OzVision units. At specific times during the day, a scheduled virtual video "tour" would record a video clip and then send a video postcard to the parents. The dealer set up the system to automatically log in and activate a strobe light, attracting the children's attention. The kids stood in front of the camera, waving hello and showing the parents what they had been doing. Some held up pictures they had drawn, others held up a book they were looking through, and some held up toys they were playing with.

Rather than being a "Big Brother" situation, the system became a school activity. Everyone was happy with the setup. The parents could still see their children without worrying about privacy issues, since the video was emailed directly to them. The children were happy because they got to show their parents what they were doing during the day, and the daycare center was pleased because it separated them from other daycare centers with this unique service - as well as providing them with additional income.
